New Syrian Spy Chief Has Long History with Turkish Intelligence Agency

Anas Hasan Khattab Was Designated a Terrorist by the U.S. for Ties to the Al-Nusra Front and Sanctioned by the U.N. for Links to Al-Qaeda

(02/01/2025)

Anas Hasan Khattab, with ties to Al-Qaeda, is now Syria's intelligence head, raising questions about Turkey's role in his ascent.

Why it matters: Khattab's appointment reveals Turkey's covert support for jihadist factions, potentially destabilizing the region further.

Turkey's secret dealings: Despite international sanctions, Turkey's intelligence network maintained ties with Khattab, ignoring U.N. and U.S. terrorist designations.

- Turkish intelligence reportedly facilitated arms and logistics to jihadist groups in Syria, defying global counterterrorism efforts.

Implications for Erdogan: The Turkish government, led by President Erdoğan, may face blowback from its engagement with jihadist factions, risking increased regional instability.

- Similar to Pakistan's experience, Turkey could encounter heightened militancy within its borders if these alliances shift against Ankara.

Answers to media questions

Following the Supreme Eurasian Economic Council Meeting Vladimir Putin answered the questions of Russian journalists.
(26/12/2024)

"Some are anticipating Oreshnik to take off and land] Putin said on Dec. 26: "You see, we always respond in kind. If certain weapons are used against us, we employ the same in return. For instance, they launched a strike by five to seven ATACMS systems. Did you hear the announcement made yesterday or the day before? The Russian Armed Forces responded with a comprehensive strike—240 or 221 strikes, something of that sort, using precision long-range weaponry."

Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov's interview with 60 Minutes television programme, Moscow, December 25, 2024
(25/12/2024)

“Putin’s June 14 speech at the Foreign Ministry... contains a demand to fulfill what has been repeatedly agreed upon over many years: demilitarization of Ukraine, and respect for the obligations under the U.N. Charter, including with regard to human rights, language and religious rights among them. Can these truly be called conditions? This is the bare minimum of what any normal member of the international community must do. We will not be satisfied with a truce. We need reliable and legally binding agreements aimed at eliminating the root causes of the conflict, addressing problems such as common security in Europe, NATO expansion, the European Union’s recent decision to become an appendage of the North Atlantic bloc, in fact, erasing all differences between these organizations, and above all, upholding the rights of the people living in these territories who have supported reunification with the Russian Federation.”

A Last Chance for Iran

America Should Give Diplomacy a Final Shot—While Preparing to Use Military Force

(02/01/2024)

For two decades, hawkish voices in Washington have called for the United States to attack Iran's nuclear program. And for two decades their calls have been rejected. That is because for most of that time, the argument against military action was compelling and straightforward. Today, there are still many good reasons to not bomb Iran. Striking the country would inject more chaos and instability into the Middle East. It would consume substantial American resources at a time when Washington wants to focus on other regions. It could undermine U.S. credibility if the attacks don't succeed. And the odds of failure are high: even the most accurate strikes might only delay Iranian nuclearization. The best, most durable solution to the issue remains a diplomatic agreement. Yet the case against military action is no longer so neat.
